Review: Time Warner Cable's Road Runner Wideband service

By Omar L. Gallaga | Thursday, September 1, 2011, 10:12 AM

Before we get to the review, a bit of breaking news we just got from Time Warner Cable. Road Runner Extreme and Standard customers are about to get a speed boost. The company says Internet service speeds are being raised from 7 Mbps download / 512 Kbps upload to 10 Mbps download / 1 Mbps for Standard customers and from 20 Mbps download / 2 Mbps upload to 30 Mbps download / 5 Mbps upload for Road Runner Extreme customers at no additional cost. The changes have already gone into effect.

The company says that there's no capping catch: the new speeds are still provided with no usage capping/broadband metering. Wideband service also has no usage limits.

Something to think about as you read our Wideband review below:

I've been a customer of Time Warner Cable's Road Runner Internet service since the late '90s and, even on the mid-tier Standard service I've been on, one complaint I've rarely had is speed. Downloads have typically been solid, video games and even HD video streaming has worked fine for me and the price has stayed consistent (about $50 a month without any other TWC services bundled in).

In July, Time Warner introduced "Wideband" Internet in the Austin area, which promises speeds of up to 50 Mbps, more than twice as fast as the service I was getting. Time Warner installed the service in my New Braunfels home for a trial, and while the installation was quick and professional, the first week with Wideband was rocky. The new cable modem that was installed, a Ubee DDW3611, doubles as a wireless router, creating its own WiFi network. What the technicians didn't tell me during the installation was that the router creates its own settings for the network. They did give me a network password that allowed me to use the new WiFi, which was actually faster than my single-band WiFi-N router's network.

One of those settings, "Enable flood control," was turned on. Until I figured out what was going on, I spent a week wondering why the network would suddenly slow to a crawl or become unavailable when I tried to multitask on the web, streaming music and opening up RSS feeds at the same time. The router thought that flurry of Internet activity was a hacking attack and began cutting off outside connections, a problem I never had with my previous service.

Once that option was disabled, things got back to normal. Download speeds, according to several speed tests I did were consistently on the 35-50 Mbps range, according to Time Warner's speed test website and other independent speed test sites I used. (Not surprisingly, TWC's speedtest reported consistently higher speeds than other speed tests did.)

To be honest, I only noticed the speed difference when downloading large files or with multiple people in the house streaming movies or music. Slow web sites are still slow if the logjam is on the other end of that connection and your computer's processing power, memory and place in the network are still going to be big factors in the speeds you get, no matter the download speeds. In a home with an older WiFi network, devices that aren't connected by wires aren't going to see huge advantages in the increased Internet speeds.

Even in those instances, there were still hiccups. My wife's more sensitive secure line to work was sometimes interrupted when we were both online at the same time. Calling the support line at Time Warner revealed that both times it happened, there were network interruptions happening in our area. (One of those times, we were told there were "Packet loss issues" in our hood). On at least a half dozen occasions in a month and a half, the modem had to be completely restarted for us to continue using the Internet.

These instances were infrequent but troubling given that I rarely had problems with the regular Road Runner service.

Where I did notice a huge difference, though, was in upload speeds. My previous upload speeds were about .5 Mbps, so slow that uploading large files frequently bogged down the entire home network. With Wideband, I got upload speeds that were a significant improvement. A set of three 50-megabyte files that used to take about 25 minutes to upload to Dropbox.com now took less than five minutes. I don't know if that's a testament to Wideband's great upload speeds or an indictment of the ridiculously slow upload speeds on Road Runner's lower-speed tiers.

Wideband costs $99 a month (or $4 more if you don't have other Time Warner Cable services). For artists and video producers who need to upload large files or small businesses with several employees online at the same time, it may be worth the expense. But for home users with typical Internet needs, it may be overkill. Upgrading your WiFi network, making sure your computers aren't too slow to take advantage of Internet speeds and looking into a less pricey tier of service (somewhere in the $40-$60 range) might better fit your needs, especially given the new Road Runner speeds for Extreme and Standard tiers we listed at the top of this review.

Jason above, please tell me what you did. I have my 2 computers connected directly to the new modem and web pages load super slow. Time Warner did a speed test and said everything was fine of course. Some websites don't load at all and some are extremely slow. Slower than my previous Roadrunner Standard. I haven't even begun to figure out how to connect it to my time capsule until I figure out why it won't load web pages correctly. I did connect it to my TC once and told me I had to choose between a shared IP and NAT. Never seen that before.

I have TWC and honestly in the 5 years I have been in this house I have had two times my internet had problems. I recently upgraded to RR extreme. I had a hell of a time getting the modem setup, even the tier 3 support didn't know how to get the modem setup correctly to work with my apple time capsule. The modem they gave me was the motorola surfboard. Once I got it all setup so I could use my own router, things have been flawless. Even over wireless. Via TW speediest or even speediest.net, I got a pegged 30Mbps/down and 5Mbps/up. I was connected for 9 hours the other day to my works VPN and never had a single disconnect or hiccup.

I also had a horrible experience with their garbage Ubee modem and went back to the regular service. If you are forced to use that garbage hardware it's not worth it.

This is the grammar of a modern journalist? geez

I hate TWC and have for years. I've been using AT&T with very few problems, though I haven't run a speed test (not that heavy of a user). However, I do notice speed fluctuations during the school year that don't occur in summer. I assume all those UT students added to the pool of users must bog the system down somewhat.

Time Warner is evil....

They bought off many apartment complexes years ago when Grande was getting started, so they're the only option in the richer parts of town. (TW skipped the poorer areas of course.) TW gets to charge higher prices in the market overall because of this monopolistic tactic.

If you actually have the option to get Grande, not only will you pay less but you'll be supporting a regional company that's had to endure unfair competition.

In some areas Grande communications has a cable modem service that works very well. Just did a speedtest.net test and got 28.71 download and 5.46 upload on my laptop. It always seems to be a bit faster with a wired connection.

The Ubee modem I was issued CAN be configured locally, I just didn't know that when they did the installation. They gave me an SSID and password to use the WiFi, but not an admin password for the modem/router. Once I figured out how to get that (I had to search through some forums and do some Googling), I was able to change any setting I wanted to, including "Enable Flood Control."

One of my friends has a TWC combination Ubee modem and router, and like yours, it cannot be administered locally...TWC must do it. The problem is that TWC delivers it with the lowest possible security setting, WEP. My friend had to call (and wait) until someone at TWC finally understood that we wanted to change the security from WEP to WPA2. It took about an hour overall.

WEP has been broken. Why does TWC (and Verizon FiOs, too) deliver a router with security that can be compromised?

To a good extent I agree with Keith.

However the alternatives are even less attractive.

TWC is a true monopoly, in Austin anyway, no competition whatsoever...

Do you hear me/us Austin City Council ?

TWC blows chunks - they will either tell you their network is fine and it is your equipment that is the problem, OR they will call you a liar that you are having problems with their service. I've even had them tell me they would disconnect my call if I did not change my tone, and I hadn't even changed my tone....not to mention putting you on one contract when you signed up for something else, and then telling you that you are SOL when your contract expires 6 mo early.....they're definately a company to stay away from
